Please consider other points of view at these discussions.

Often, the result of the rulemaking process has caused much more harm to the people and the environment that the regulations were intended to help.

Greenhouse gas is based on an extremely weak hypothesis and suspect data. The money being wasted on "global warming" could be used so much more effectively fighting hunger, disease, improving third world economies, and our own.

The high speed train, raising fuel prices, mandating renewable energy (not really renewable), carbon credits, etc. are all paid by the public in the end. Unfortunately the people with the fewer resources will be hurt the most.

Frustration with most regulatory agencies, especially CARB, is building throughout the public sector. Hopefully the pushback won't undo some of the good things that have been accomplished. At the same time, patience and the pursuit of true science and proven sustainable solutions, will result in a better place to live for everyone. CO2 is not a pollutant, greenhouse gases have a minimum affect on global warming compared to H2O, and the anthropogenic contribution to global warming is miniscule compared to nature itself. Please slow down the regulatory costs to people and the environment. Let true science develop answers and solutions.....
